Pienocentras with all its departments continued to function throughout the Soviet Russian occupation, although it was transformed into a government agency. In June, 1941, when the Soviet Russian occupation was replaced by the German occupation, Pienocentras[1] came under the control of the German Economic Command (Wirtschaftskommando), also as government agency. In September, 1941, German Commissar for Lithuania von Renteln issued an order granting monopoly to Pienocentras in the business of dairy products and at the same time forbidding anybody to trade in milk products. Since Pienocentras has a wide organization throughout Lithuania, it is very convenient for the Germans in their control of milk production and in their efforts to extract from Lithuania a maximum of milk products. Of course no statistical data is available for Pienocentras's economic activities during the periods of German and Russian occupation.

Deserving of mention in this group is a local grocery trade coöperative society in Kaunas called Parama which owns and operates thirty modern grocery stores, as well as the largest and most modern bakery in Lithuania, with an annual production valued at about six million litas. Its fate under the German occupation is similar to that of Pienocentras.

4 and 5. Insurance and nonclassified coöperatives.—These two groups are of minor importance in the economic life of Lithuania. Insurance, still undeveloped there, is one of the fields open for coöperation in the future. In 1938 there were two insurance coöperative societies with 7,486 members. Insurance premiums collected in 1938 amounted to 355,495 litas, which, compared with the development of other co-
